Courses Taught (Selected Examples):

Air Command and Staff College:

National and International Security Studies 2003-2005:

The International Security Studies course provides a foundation for understanding the international security environment and its implications for the United States, as well as how the US both shapes and responds to this environment. The course also examines the instruments of power, and how these are wielded by both state and non-state actors to affect the international environment. In addition, the course examines the US national strategic decision-making process, examining how the actors and systems translate policy into action through the use of the IOPs.

Regional and Cultural Studies 2009 (online):

The Regional/Cultural Studies course introduces students to regional and cultural factors and discusses how these factors are motivating actors within the international security environment. Through this course students grasp the important role that culture plays in determining operational success. Students are also exposed to the unique ways in which their own cultural perspectives influence both their outlook and interaction with other societies. Through this experience, students come to understand the unique security challenges and opportunities posed by culture and how best to respond to ensure success.

Challenges to U.S. Interests in Northeast Asia (China, Korea, Japan) 2003-2005

This course examined the cultural, social, political, and military issues that were key to understanding the nation-states on the Korean Peninsula, China, and Japan. The course focused on both international security issues and on issues that were important to the citizens who lived in this region - in an effort to give students a better understanding of why this region is so important to the United States and its ongoing national security interests.

Norwich University:

Conflict Avoidance, Prevention & Containment in the International System 2005-2007

This course addressed the multiple schools of debate concerning the causes of conflict and war. The increasingly controversial area of peacekeeping and peacemaking was investigated. Transnational forces, including non-governmental organizations using diplomacy as a tool to avoid conflict in the international system, were examined. Finally, the important concept of multilateral peace enforcement was reviewed with an eye toward lessons learned.

Marine Corps Command and Staff College:

Culture and Interagency Operations 2005-2010

The purpose of the Culture and Interagency Operation Course is to improve the ability of students to analyze cultures and to work with organizations that employ all instruments of national power. The course is also designed to develop students' critical thinking skills and their understanding of counterinsurgency, counterterrorism, peace operations, multinational operations, and strategy and policy.

Challenges to U.S. Security in Northeast Asia (Korea and Japan) 2005-2010

For the purposes of this curriculum, the primary focus during the class is on the Korean Peninsula (the North Korean nuclear and conventional threat is one of the highest priorities for US National Security). In order to truly understand the issues important to the Korean Peninsula, one must make a careful examination of the history, culture, politics, and sociology in the "Land of the Morning Calm." By the end of the course, the students have a complete understanding of the decision making process within both the North and South Korean governments, the cultural and historical influences that have such a strong impact on this process, and the influence that this has on the ROK-US Alliance and in Washington's dealings with the isolated government in North Korea. In addition, the student will gain a knowledge of cultural, political, and military issues that are important to the Washington-Tokyo Alliance and the future of Northeast Asia.

Culture and Strategy in the Chinese Military Tradition 2008

This course introduces the student to Chinese culture and the major threads of Chinese philosophy and the ways these ideas influenced early Chinese military thought. After a grounding in some basic concepts of Chinese culture and the evolution of those ideas to the Song Dynasty (C. 1000 C.E.), the course moves forward to explore the founding of the PLA in 1927 and the development of PLA notions of operational art and political work that helped the Chinese Communist Party to gain victory in the Chinese Civil War. The course concludes with a series of seminars that examine the contemporary PLA and it program of modernization. Finally, the seminar will return to the connection between culture and contemporary Chinese strategy by exploring the way the Chinese view the world and programs they have created to respond to those views.

Angelo State University 2011-Present:

CUL 3310 Introduction to Cultural Competence: Making Sense of the World I:

This course serves as an introduction to various analytical approaches for understanding the dynamics of global interaction. Students will explore the variety of "worlds" made visible through the lens of theory.

The course aims to foster critical thinking about how conceptual tools shape our understanding of the world and attempted solutions to global problems.

CCSS 3317 American Government Politics and National Security:

This course introduces students to the study of politics and government and examines the basic ideological, structural, and procedural choices faced by any political system. Students will understand the foundations and traditions of American democracy and the structure, decision processes and policy outcomes, especially defense policy outputs, of the American political system. Students will also examine current policy issues that affect the military.

CCSS 4325 Cultural Competency and Contemporary Security Issues in Asia:

This course focuses on current, major issues within the Asian region. While engaging in critical analysis of current issues, it examines the broader conceptual context and analytic framework that explain interactions within the region and the international arena.

CCSS 3323 The Politics and Culture of Asia:

This course examines the historic, cultural, economic, processes and interstate relations. The course will also cover contemporary regional issues such as the influence of Japan and China on regional and global affairs with a particular focus on regional security concerns.

SEC 6309 Grand Strategy and National Security:

This course will give students key insights into the basic elements of grand strategy and how these tie in to Security Studies. The course gives students a unique baseline of knowledge that will be important as students move into the other aspects of the Security Studies program. Key issues that will be addressed in detail include: 1. The national security decision making process – particularly as it relates to issues of international and homeland security; 2. Civil-military relations as applicable in the development of strategy and statecraft; 3. An analysis of how nation-states develop military operational capabilities and readiness; and 4. The differing strategies for international conflict, to include both conventional and unconventional warfare.

SEC 6316 Peacekeeping and Stability Operations:

Stability and peace operations have become an integral part of United States foreign and military policy. This course analyzes several concepts, to include nation building, stabilization, and reconstruction. It also examines the roles of various groups that have become important to these types of operations in the 21st century. These groups include nongovernmental organizations, intergovernmental organizations, and governmental organizations. The course will examine the roles and missions of the many new players who have become integral to stability and peacekeeping operations.

SEC 6315 Rogue Nations and National Security:

The end of the Cold War brought in a new era of world politics and security issues for the United States. But with the fall of the Berlin Wall and the end of the Soviet Union also came a new phenomenon – Rogue States. Countries such as Iran, North Korea, Syria, Cuba, and others have refused to change their governments in modern times, and continue to conduct policies that are hostile to the United States and its allies. This course will examine exactly what it is that makes up a rogue state, why the politics of rogue states are dangerous to the United States and its allies, and how these hostile policies can be countered. The course will also examine several important recent case studies.

SEC 6317 WMD, Proliferation, and National Security:

As the United States looks to an uncertain future in the 21st century, control of weapons of mass destruction and the proliferation of these weapons, ahs become one of the most important national security issues. Because many nations are not transparent about either their capabilities or intentions, this is also a very difficult issue to analyze for American policy makers and their staffs. This class will examine important case studies such as the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT), the role of the IAEA and other elements of the UN in countering WMD and proliferation, and key state actors that pose the greatest threat to American security because of their pursuit of WMD capabilities and/or proliferation.

SEC 6327 Security Issues in Asia I:

This course will cover contemporary regional issues such as the influence of Japan, India, Korea, and China on regional and global affairs with a particular focus on regional security concerns. The focus of this course is on the changing dynamics of contemporary international security in Asia. This course will include several important case studies that are important to understanding regional security in Asia. These case studies will include, but not be limited to, the ongoing and hotly debated military rise of China and the implications for the region and the world; the nuclear stand-off on the Korean peninsula; contemporary security issues in Southeast Asia; the India-Pakistan conflict; and transnational security issues in Asia.
